It is important to critically evaluate your information sources when researching an assignment. Be suspicious and think about the reliability of the information you come across. If this is new to you a useful place to start is the following CRAAP Test criteria (with thanks to the Meriam Library, California State University, Chico). Or try the TU Dublin Library subject specific LibGuides.

Currency
Is the item dated, updated? If so, when was the last update or revision? How current are the references (if any) or web links? Have any expired?

Relevance
What topics are covered? Is it of an appropriate level to your assignment? How in-depth is the material? Is it scholarly, academic, well-presented or just an opinion? Would you cite it in your assignment?

Authority
Is there an author? Is the web page signed? Is the author qualified? Are they affiliated to a research institute or university? Is their work reviewed? Are they cited by others?

Accuracy
Is the web information reliable and error-free? Is it supported by evidence?

Purpose
What’s the purpose of the information? Is it trying to teach, inform, sell, entertain or persuade? Is the website intention’s clear? Is there any political, cultural, religious or personal bias or propaganda? Does the information appear impartial and objective? Is there any advertising on the webpage? Is it commercial in origin?
